Here is another map if they want lines to be closer to main streets. Same reasoning as olive. But now there is a deviation of 537 people.

North Huntington Park

The northern section of Huntington Park is unique, combining medium-density residential areas with commercial corridors and the city's historic industrial zone. By keeping these areas together, the district represents a community that blends residential living with economic activity. This district honors the city's history while supporting its future growth.

Southwest Huntington Park

The southwest district includes high-density residential neighborhoods, industrial areas to the west, and the vibrant downtown to the east. While this area currently has a lower population of only 38 individuals, however, future mixed-use developments downtown will help balance that deficit. This forward-thinking approach ensures the district remains equitable as the city evolves.

Central Huntington Park

The central district is the heart of Huntington Park, encompassing a mix of medium- and low-density residential areas along with municipal buildings. Keeping this area unified ensures that residents near city services and government offices share representation. This district reflects the administrative and civic core of our community.

Southeast Huntington Park

The southeast district is primarily low-density residential, featuring Salt Lake Park and a key commercial corridor. These neighborhoods value open space and family-oriented amenities, so grouping them together preserves their shared lifestyle and priorities. This district represents a quieter, more suburban character within the city.

Northeast Huntington Park

The northeast district combines high- and medium-density housing with a sliver of manufacturing. This area is particularly special because it is surrounded on three sides by other municipalities, each with different development patterns. By keeping this section unified within Huntington Park, we ensure that residents have a strong voice in local decisions and are not overshadowed by external influences. This district reflects the economic diversity and resilience of our city.
